

I feel it important the FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. Since the implementation of Indiana's law, family time at home has improved to the point we can enjoy quiet evenings together without getting up to answer the telephone for pesky sales calls.

Effectively Indiana's law has reduced the number of calls I received from approximately 10 to 14 per week (depending on the time of year) to 'maybe' one every TWO MONTHS! Even during the elections I only received two or three calls.

Indiana has passed a law THAT WORKS. It has pass the test of constitutionality in the Great State of Indiana. If the FCC is to do anything, which I hope at this time it does not, it should consider the Indiana law as BARE MINIMUM guideline. Any thing less, to me, is a dis-service to the citizens of the State of Indiana.

Sincerely,

Robert A. Blubaugh

Any of your personal views about the importance of Indiana's law.